It was a regular day down on Red Sea beach. Two Egyptian police officers were doing their routine patrol when they heard a man in the distance spouting out some religious sermons. They rushed down to see who it was. This was a serious offense according to the ruling Pharaoh. This was a time when Hebrew slaves were prominent and the Pharaoh was afraid that the man named Moses would lead them against the Pharaoh.

When the two officers arrived, they found a man in a long cloak with a white beard and staff. His hands were raised and he was shouting to the sky. All of a sudden a nearby bush caught on fire.

The officers were shocked and told him to stop and that he would be arrested.

Moses told them that God has spoken and that all the Hebrews must be freed from slavery.

The officers didn't know what to do and told him that they were going for back up.

Moses warned the officers before they ran off of ten terrible things, but they were too scared and needed to get backup. Moses was going to have to speak with the Pharaoh and tell him to let the Hebrew slaves go. If the Pharaoh would not listen and do as he is commanded, then there would be ten plagues that would be sent by God. The worst of the them was that the Pharaoh's eldest son died. All of this was predicted by Moses.

The Pharaoh was so upset that he let Moses lead the Hebrews out of the Egypt.

But the Pharaoh changed his mind, and sent his army, lead by the two officers, after them. The Hebrews were at the shores of the Red Sea with no escape.

Moses heard the word of God again and was told to lift his staff to part the Red Sea.

It worked and all of the Hebrew men, women and children were able to make it through the dry part of the sea. When all was safe, Moses lifted his staff and the water returned to swallow Pharaoh's army.

The journey of the Hebrews out of Egypt would continue for many months and years. Many hardships, but with the help of Moses and the word of God, the Hebrews would survive.
